Thanks for getting back to me.

It sounds like you haven't actually searched for records, but that you're saying you can tell in advance of a search that any responsive records will be exempt, and therefore you're not required to search. This is not how the law works. You're required to search, to find actual records that are responsive, and then to say, having looked at the records, that they're exempt.

Furthermore, I am asking for records about a policy, not about applications of that policy in specific investigations. If there are any records responsive to my request they will be statements of or discussions about policy, and therefore not plausibly exempt because of their investigative character.

Can you please confirm that you have actually done a search for the records I asked about and, having looked at them, determined that each one is exempt?

Thanks!

To clarify, I am advising you that there may be information responsive to your request, but since any existing responsive documents were obtained or created as part of complaint investigations, we will not be providing them to you as they are exempt from disclosure.
